Editor:

Chancellor Atherton's Fairness Crusade requires that we have half the number of classified employees that we need, and that they all be paid half what they're worth. In exchange for this minor inconvenience, consider that we now have twice as many district administrators as we need, and that they are all paid twice what they're worth. What a wonderfully fair arrangement!

Remnants of the Old Boy network are resisting the Fairness Crusade, however. Bookstore manager Mike Valverde, for example, tried to pay key classified employees a reasonable wage. Valverde thinks that just because he runs an efficient bookstore he should be able to pay his employees what they're worth. This is an outrage.
